In heart, true to his youth's bright dreams Long, long ago a maiden hand Was laid with woman's trust in his, A woman's reseate, velvet cheek Slept on his breast in bridal bliss. White fingers, fair as moonbeams strayed, In tender dal lance o'er his brow; Then in the early grave were laid,

And he, with blighted heart went on, Unloving on his lonely way, The shadow of the lonely gone, Beep hid within his heart alway And men thought not that calm outside Was frozen by the grave's chill breath !-None heard from him of that pale bride,

Who slumbered in the halls of death. Now bear him from the city's walls, The crowded mart of trick and trade, To where the greenwood shadow falls, O'er the bright sward where she is laid; And lay him close beside the lost, To whom that plain, blunt heart was true,-For years on life's sea tempest tost,

His brown hair in rich masses waved Above a smooth and youthful brow; And fresh, young blood the pulses laved, That lie so still and silent now, When she was gathered there to sleep, Like a crushed lily, fair and pale,-Thin silver-threaded locks, and deep

Care written brow, now tell their tale. But 'twill not to her heart seem strange, As 'neath the sun and starlight's smile, They wait the body's final change, In happy dreamless rest meanwhile; Till the Archangel's trump of doom Shall wake the nations of the dead,

And from the portals of the tomb They rise, in deathless love re-wed.
